Rapid sequencing of the entire genome at a relatively low cost and turnaround time has garnered more and more interest in direct-to-consumer genetic tests, as consumers seek to use their newly available data to feel better about themselves and their health. However, it is important to note that the results of these tests are not identical to those obtained from a physician; rather, they yield general information about an individual's current and future health. In fact, recent studies have suggested that merely providing consumers with genetic test results is insufficient to promote healthy lifestyles and may not help to improve quality of life or reduce the risk of developing diseases. These studies have made it clear that providing consumers with genetic information is only helpful when the data is used as a starting point for informed health choices and lifestyle changes to promote a healthier life. Consumers are likely to be motivated to make health decisions based on their genetic data if the information is presented in a way that makes sense to them and that supports their goals and values. We will be able to do a better job of addressing consumer needs if we understand the most important factors affecting their ability to make informed and healthy decisions and take steps to ensure that consumers are able to make those decisions. The National Human Genome Research Institute has announced that it will be funding up to four calls for research proposals to spur innovation, education, and partnerships in genomic research. The research themes for these calls include determining the underlying mechanisms of human disease, developing genomic tools for precision medicine, and developing computational models and approaches that will accelerate and
