The authors compared the combined treatment of obstructive sleep apnea syndrome (OSAS) and hypertension with the independent use of the two therapeutic modalities in 26 patients (14 with OSAS alone and 12 with hypertension alone). Apneas were identified by simultaneous polysomnography and measurement of the arterial oxygen tension (PaO2). Hypertension was assessed by 24-hour monitoring and by evaluation of mean arterial pressure (MAP). A satisfactory response to treatment was shown in 60% of cases of OSAS. A relationship between oxygen desaturation (apnea-hypopnea index, AHI) and mean arterial pressure (MAP) was established. The apnea index (AI) and the oxygen desaturation index (DI) correlated positively with MAP and their values rose after treatment. In cases of hypertension the combined treatment was successful in 6/12 patients (50%).
