I am very excited for Photoshop CC, but I feel that it can still benefit from a few fixes or a few more features, if only for the sake of simplicity. For example, I would like to be able to customize the various panels, so that I could have some extra things like a way to leave feedback, etc. The new tools feel like a “patch on top”, which is understandable given the numerous additions. That said, I can detect a lot of “fine polish” in the software, which is impressive. For example, there’s a Smart Object layer, which has existed in Photoshop since CS5. Photoshop Creative Cloud also adds some tools that are a lot more powerful than those in the basic version. The Content Aware Fill is brilliant, especially since I get to use it with regular JPEGs. Content Aware Fill allows you to automatically fill any area of an image that has similar (or completely identical) colors. For example, if you had a shot of a table, but all your other photos were of a couch, and your current image has a couch in it too, you can fill in all the other areas using the regular tool set. The software can even detect the furniture, so it won’t replace your background, but rather place a new background over it (CFF uses a texture, so it’s not as equally as perfect as the Source-to-Remap tool). It’s actually a lot of fun to play with the software, and it’s got a good Feel to it. The new Content Aware Fill tool is really powerful, but sort of improves the existing tool for the worse. It’s as if Adobe just put the two names together.
