Also, an issue that still plagues many users of both Lightroom and Photoshop is the way in which pencil / brush tools work. Either they are shared or not shared at all, depending on the workflow applied. As I already mentioned, Lightroom does include brush support. However, in my experience, it is somewhat slow. Although the brushes can be large, they are not as fast to work with as those that are shared within the same app. Of course, this is not of huge importance on a desktop computer; however, I have zero doubt that it will get even worse on mobile devices. When you have hundreds of images to edit on the go, you want to be just a few steps away from having all the tools you want and need right at your fingertips. Furthermore, I, rather cynically, have to wonder if there's any longer any need for brushes on mobile devices. If I were to state the obvious, I'd probably be accused of, quite rightly, being overly critical. But the truth of the matter is that Adobe's workflow on mobile devices and in particular the iPad Pro is not instant and smooth. A certain level of patience is required. I liked the iPad Pro and do own it, but I do think it is time for Adobe to take a step back and focus a bit more on fixing issues. After all, Lightroom has already been released for iOS for several years now. The iPad Pro is a great machine, and the way in which Adobe treats it is not very good, and is even downright bad at times. Rather than "iterating and iterating and iterating" to make it better, perhaps Adobe could start taking decisions that are of much greater impact. We've already seen that they spend more time focusing on the desktop experience on Android devices. However, I am quite sure that the company will keep iterating at some point. Perhaps they should focus on some other areas first, such as storage or battery life.
